She felt she could almost gladly exchange conditions with the loved and loving little crippled child--but that could not be; neither could she dare to look upon that, to her, peace-dwelling room, as her home. It was merely a breathing place, a present rest. She was like a weary-winged sea-bird, who after battling with the wind and waves had found a moment's footing on the point of a rock which a transient lull in the stormy sea had discovered, but which would in another minute be again lost and hidden beneath washing waves. Phillis knew she could not remain long with Mrs Marshal, for she was a poor woman, and even in giving Phillis shelter for the time, she was doing more than she could really afford, and then, once more cast adrift, where was she...
