Timber production and stream-flow protection were and still are the primary objectives of national forest management, but the rapidly changing order of our national life has emphasized other social and economic needs which can, in large measure, be met by the national forests without undue impairment or diminution of their major services. One of these needs is that of continued and adequate opportunity to study and enjoy the relatively unmodified manifestations of natural phenomena; to indulge in a wide variety of outdoor activities of an educational, inspirational, and recreational character. Within the boundaries of the national forests there are, inevitably, many areas rich in scenic, geological, biological, and recreational interest. These, as a rule, are integrally related to the national forests of which they are parts, to a degree which renders their segregation and separate administration of doubtful practicability and economy. Maximum effectiveness of management and economy of public funds will, in the majority of such cases, be secured by continuing such areas as parts of the national forests, applying to them the special principles of management and development under which their unique qualities and values will be conserved and made publicly available in proper coordination with the use and management of the contiguous areas....
