Excerpt: .motions and if the efficiency for reversed motion is zero? Exercise 172. Show that the efficiency of a complex machine equals the product of the efficiencies of its individual parts. Exercise 173. From the result of Ex. 172 show that the efficiency of a machine must decrease with an increase in the number of its parts. Section XLX SCREWS The discussion of screws used for transmitting force or energy involves sliding friction. Square-threaded Screws.--In Fig. 90 assume the p couple, formed by the forces--at a distance l from the z axis of the screw, to be on the point of overcoming the useful resistance Q acting along the axis of the screw. Then the only other forces acting upon the screw are the reactions of the nut upon it. These reactions will be distributed over the left-hand helicoidal surfaces of the threads. The forces acting along any element of these surfaces (from a radius r_1 to a radius r_2) may, without serious error, be assumed concentrated on this element at a mean radius $r = \frac{r_1 + r_2}{2}$, so that all reactions may be assumed to act along a helix lying upon a cylinder of radius r . The sum of the projections of these reactions, $2J$, upon a plane normal to the axis must then balance the p moment due to the two driving forces-- , so that $r_2, R = \frac{p}{2}$ or $2R = r$ Moreover, as Fig. 90 shows, the normal...
